SECTION 1

Introduction

The VO

The Value Orientations (VO) assessment measures your acceptance and rejection of particular valuing systems or worldviews. Value orientations can be likened to complex belief systems, specifically about what is desirable and important in life and what is not. These represent core intelligences, ways of perceiving the world and decision-making frameworks which guide a person's thinking, emotion and behaviour in different contexts. Although not necessarily consciously chosen, a value orientation acts as an organising principle according to which a person adapts to the world. Due to psychological and environmental factors, value orientations may gradually change and develop during a person's lifetime.

Exploring your value orientations often creates self-insight, a greater understanding of your relationships and your choices in life. It can also give an indication of why certain things frustrate you, what you believe success involves as well as how you would approach leadership roles and the workplace in general. Understanding your value orientation(s) and an awareness of the worldviews of other people can facilitate better communication and be useful in resolving conflict.

In this report, the valuing orientations accepted and rejected by Elmien1 are identified and discussed in terms of the following: the worldview adhered to, typical behaviour to be expected, prime motivators and emotional manifestations. In addition, some implications for job functioning are also indicated by describing Elmien1's preferred organisational environment and leadership style.

Please note: The colours are used to simplify and understand the seven value orientations. They are used purely for clarification and classification purposes and do not have any extra meaning or connotations.

Theoretical model

The VO assessment is based on the value orientations theory by Graves, Beck and Cowan in their Spiral Dynamics model. It also incorporates Wilber's AQAL model, May's Whirl model, Myss's work on the structures of consciousness reflected by various spiritual traditions, Kohlberg's work on moral development and other consciousness theorists such as Loevinger, Gebser, Perry and Piaget. All the above models essentially reflect the same theoretical structure and can be arranged into a spiral. This is the structure that is assessed and reported on.

The Spiral Dynamics model

INTEGRATIVE

- Lives life fully and responsibly
- Strong learning orientation
- Seeks new experiences
- Pragmatic and functional approach
- Communicates simplicity after considering complexity
- Individualistic and values freedom of choice

May seem uncommitted, unemotional or disinterested

PERFORMANCE

- Focused on creating value and prosperity
- Independent-minded, autonomous
- Seeks and spots opportunities
- Generates alternative strategies or narratives
- Risk-taking
- Takes and expects accountability

Can be opportunistic or manipulative

ENERGETIC

- Wilful and shows a need for excitement and challenge
- Assertive and determined
- Seeks sensory gratification
- Action-orientated, goal-directed and effective
- Prepared to fight for limited resources
- Seeks respect and recognition

Can be fearful, impulsive and egocentric

TRANSCENDENT

- Existential philosophical orientation
- Conscious and aware
- Sees everything as interconnected
- Collective awareness
- Prefers a simple life
- Pursues non-attachment

May seem other-worldly

HUMANISTIC

- Open-minded, relativistic and compassionate
- People-orientated and relationship building
- May be theoretically and scientifically orientated
- Promotes interpersonal harmony and acceptance
- Seeks consensus and reconciliation

Can be relativistic in decision-making

DEPTH AND ORDER

- Values purpose, truth and quality
- Conformist and committed
- Seeks stability, certainty and creates structure
- Supports status quo
- Values tradition and the tried-and-tested
- Loyal to organisations or institutions

May come across as somewhat inflexible

GROUP BELONGING

- Strong family and team alliances
- Emphasis on in-group versus out-group membership
- Likes ritual, community or group celebrations
- Often ethnocentric, religious and loyal
- Personal identity linked to group identity
- Values authority, tradition and respect

May be dependent on other people or a group – can be self-sacrificial

Individualistic Collectivistic

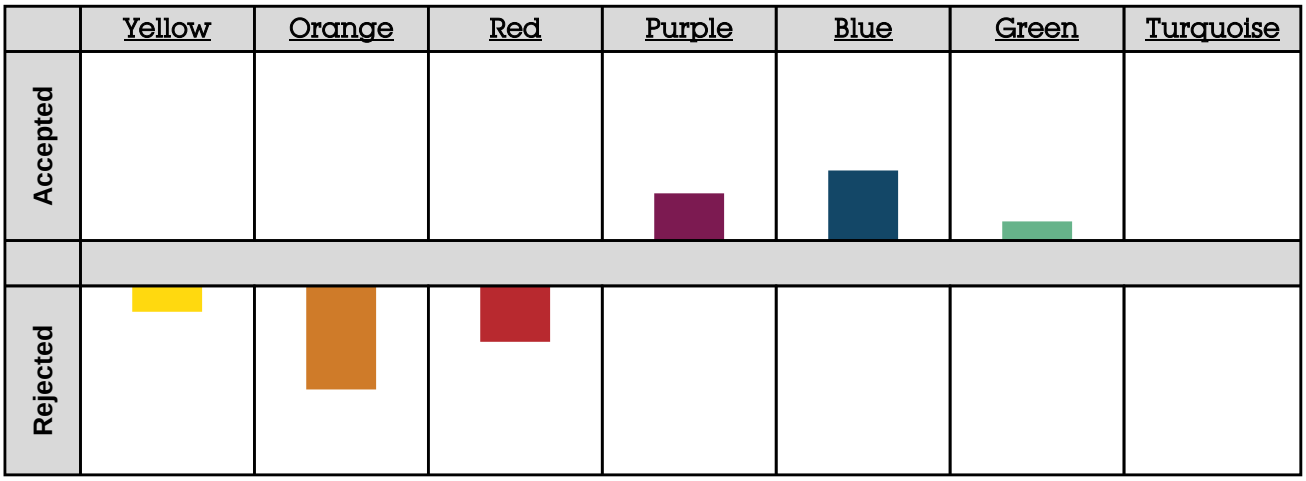
Elmien1's VO assessment results



Accepted value orientations: Blue and Purple

Elmien1 accepts the purple and blue valuing systems

(holds order and obedience to authority in high regard; concerned about "right and wrong"; has a collective orientation; values group belonging)

Worldview adhered to

A central theme in Elmien1's approach to life, is the preference for order and discipline. To individuals showing an acceptance of this combination of valuing systems, it is imperative to adhere to a code of conduct, and a definite distinction is drawn between "right" and "wrong". They tend to see a grand design underpinning human existence that provides meaning to life, hence the emphasis on the "right" way and "righteous" living. For Elmien1, belonging to a close-knit group and upholding the traditions and symbols of this group, constitute essential components of this "right way of living". To these individuals, the group is more important than the individual: individualism and selfishness are frowned upon.

Typical behaviour

These views tend to manifest themselves in dutifully following this "right way of living". Diligence is probably seen in a very positive light by Elmien1 and self-sacrifice - especially for the benefit of the in-group - is not excluded. Characteristics that are also held in high regard include: loyalty, patriotism, faithfulness, reliability, Truth, a Higher Power, self-discipline, positional power, obedience to authority, moral fibre (in terms of promoting the benefits of the group) and character building.

Motivators

Core motivators in Elmien1's life are "doing what is right", being honourable, and acting in accordance with the group identity. The safety and security offered by the familiarity of the in-group and the predictability of an orderly existence, also seem to be very important to her.

Emotional manifestations

Elmien1 puts a high premium on being trustworthy, reliable and honourable, and may even regard her role or position in the group as more important than individual needs. Thus, she may have the ability to defer the gratification of personal needs if it serves the purposes of the "master plan". The emphasis tends to be on working hard and abiding by the rules (especially that of the in-group), rather than on innovative thinking and risk taking. There is, however, a "shadow side" to this combination of valuing systems including, being judgmental, harbouring strong feelings of guilt, being rigid and self-righteous, lacking the ability to compromise and being relatively closed to influences other that those originating from within the in-group.

Organisational environment preferred

Elmien1 is probably best suited to an organisation that is structured hierarchically, and where clear-cut rules, regulations and procedures exist. She would appear to feel comfortable in familiar and predictable surroundings. If her sense of belonging is lodged with a group within the organisation, Elmien1 can be expected to promote teamwork and may even sacrifice herself for the benefit of that group. These individuals may fall into the trap of working hard rather than smart, may suppress own emotional needs, may become emotionally blunted, and may maintain inappropriate or outdated institutions or structures at all cost.

Implications for leadership

If/when in a leadership position, she is likely to base her leadership style on the assumption that there is a "master plan" necessitating hard work, diligence, a traditional approach and group cohesion. Failure to fulfil one's duty will therefore be frowned upon. Abiding by the rules and regulations, following pre-determined procedures and organisational "traditions", respecting the positional structure of the organisation and creating a stable, secure work environment may constitute the cornerstones of her approach to leadership. These leaders may apply a traditional approach, learn from experience, and focus on maintenance as opposed to innovation. They also tend to be empowered by their position (positional power).

Rejected value orientations: Orange and Red

Elmien1 rejects the red and orange valuing systems

(rejects a forceful, domineering approach; rejects an overemphasis on achievement, competition and material gain)

Worldview rejected

Elmien1 seems to reject emotionally driven self-centredness in herself and others. To her life is not about personal power and recognition, wealth or outsmarting others. She is not driven to prove herself, to create territory and boundaries, or to achieve status. To place emphasis on self-importance and materialistic superficiality is for Elmien1, to miss the point. Principles such as "survival of the fittest" or "the sky is the limit", are seen as extremes to which she doesn't ascribe.

Behaviour typically rejected

She would appear to rebuff actions associated with personal conquests, vendettas, and manipulative behaviour designed to secure maximum personal profit. That is, an overemphasis on self-interest is not seen as desirable. There is little appreciation for those who present a tough or aggressive image, and who strive to be in control at all times. She would also appear to have little tolerance for a superficial quest for personal gain, success, and/or material wealth.

Avoided motivators

Elmien1 is motivated by neither the quest to prove herself and gain recognition, nor by the need to engage in conflict in order to procure her "share". Elmien1 is probably not energised by the prospect of "playing the game" or getting "a piece of the action" per se. In itself, material wealth, success or status acts as a poor incentive for behaviour.

Emotional manifestations rejected

Emotional expressions of impulsivity, a lack of consequential thinking, aggression, defensiveness, egocentrism and the need for respect and recognition seem to deter Elmien1. She is likely to adopt a somewhat jaundiced view of a superficial, calculated, opportunistic and insensitive quest for personal gain. These individuals also tend to be weary of insincerity, an overly confident reliance on one's own capabilities, as well as the tendency to embrace risk.

Less preferred organisational environment

Elmien1 does not abide by the view that all human nature is fundamentally selfish and untrustworthy. It follows that she does not underscore the importance of excessively forceful leadership or "carrot-and-stick" methods to motivate others. To Elmien1, one's loyalty to the organisation should depend on neither fear nor on the latter's perceived worth for self-advancement. She may also be ill suited to an organisational environment characterised by a strong emphasis on crass materialism, status symbols, and the excitement derived from deal-making. This person may also be somewhat weary or suspicious of politically acceptable talk and behaviour.

Implications for leadership

If/when in a position of leadership, Elmien1 would probably try to avoid coming across as domineering, manoeuvring or scheming. She does not ascribe to the opinion that people need to be coerced and/or outsmarted in order to work. She is also likely to recognise that people are motivated to work by more than mere material rewards or the fear of retribution.

Team Functioning

Valuing orientations that Elmien1 accepts

Elmien1's profile indicates that she accepts the following value orientation(s).

The value orientation(s) accepted by Elmien1 indicates her likely behaviour and how she may be perceived by others who do not embrace the same value orientations.

Characteristics of the Blue value orientation
The Blue value orientation is typically characterised by the following:	Those who reject the Blue value orientation may perceive you as:
• Structured and rule-based culture • Driven to create stability and security • Bureaucratic • Code of conduct • Clearly specified roles • Honour, responsibility and reliability • Diligence, conscientiousness and dedication • Principled and courageous • Action orientated • Compliant • May sacrifice for the benefit of the organisational goals • A focus on quality and service orientation • Practical and task-focused • Fair, consistent leadership	• Rigid and inflexible • Traditional and change resistant • Radical and fundamental • Inappropriate emphasis on principles • Low sense of self-knowledge • Misses subtle nuances • Critical and has excessively high standards • Unnecessary self-sacrifice and submission • Needing security • Low focus on individual uniqueness and emotions

Characteristics of the Purple value orientation
The Purple value orientation is typically characterised by the following:	Those who reject the Purple value orientation may perceive you as:
• Traditional culture • Protective environment • Religious routines, superstitions or spiritual fears • Group responsibility • Ethnic / family / group belonging • Security focused • Team cohesion • Ethnocentric • Patriotism and loyalty to group / leaders • Paternalistic / maternalistic leadership	• Dependent on others • Groupthink / group identity • Not taking personal responsibility • Submissive • Rigid or inflexible • Closed-minded • Family orientated / nepotistic • Superstitious / dogmatically religious

Valuing orientations that Elmien1 rejects

Elmien1's profile indicates that she rejects the following value orientation(s).

The value orientation(s) rejected by Elmien1 indicates how she is likely to perceive the behaviours of those who accept the value orientation.

Characteristics of the Orange value orientation
The Orange value orientation is typically characterised by the following:	You may perceive people who accept the Orange value orientation as:
• Innovative and entrepreneurial • Planned / achievement orientation • Capable of change • Empowered to create the future • Focus on personal performance, responsibility and self-expression • Emphasis on value creation, win-win solutions • Focus on perceptions • Abundance mentality, explores opportunities • Energetic • Calculated risk-taking • Individualistic, strong willed, determined • Politically astute • Aware of image management • Materialistic measurement of success • Resilient • Optimistic • Self-actualising and independent-minded • Negotiative, influential leadership	• Status conscious • Materialistic / strong commercial orientation • Uncommitted to group goals • Manipulative of perceptions, possibly exploitative • Politically astute, may be insincere • Egocentric and can be somewhat wilful or arrogant • Flexible, opportunistic • Careless at times • Goals may justify the means

Characteristics of the Red value orientation
The Red value orientation is typically characterised by the following:	You may perceive people who accept the Red value orientation as:
• Competitive, hard-driving culture • Goal achievement • Energetic / adrenalin driven • Reality / external world orientation • Focused on power and achievement • Task and action focus • Driven to overcome obstacles • Linear sequences to achievement • Critical and discerning • Survival intuition • Potentially emotional • Focused on desire and sensation • Strong, passionate and inspirational leadership • Likely to have clear boundaries • Power, hierarchies, and authoritarian leadership	• Domineering, overpowering, wilful • Egocentric / ego driven • Possible anxiety • Need for recognition and respect • Fear of failure • Lacking self-knowledge • Can be impulsive, unsophisticated or crass • Views opportunities as scarce • Conflict prone • External locus of control • Effective but sometimes misses nuances • Expects results, may hold grudges • Can be demanding, harsh or inflexible

Leadership implications

A person's value orientations and / or worldviews largely determines how one would approach leadership roles. Possible developmental guidelines are provided for those in leadership positions.

Leadership qualities of the Blue value orientation
Psychological theme: power in the external world

Requirement for optimal performance

A prerequisite for the optimal expression of this value orientation is a sense of achievement in certain aspects of one's life. It is also important to have internalised a set of cultural norms and experience security and predictability, all of which may contribute to a sense of order, energy and personal purpose.

You are likely to focus your time and energy on the external world of work, production and interaction with people. You probably invest a lot in performance, achievement, results, structure, discipline, commitment and work ethic. Personal goals often centre on practical, tangible and stability issues. You are likely to have a survival intuition aimed at creating stability, certainty and security. You may measure your own worth in terms of how effectively you organise others / the environment and achieve certain tangible goals.

Expected leadership behaviour

This valuing orientation is often characterised by you seeking to exercise your power to provide for yourself, those closest to you as well as those in your organisation who rely on you. Most energy is spent on implementing norms, creating tangible structures, meeting expectations and providing what is reasonable and realistic. You can be relied upon to implement solutions, follow them through and achieve tangible results in the external world. You may value integrity in yourself and others, as well as quality, depth and the truth.

Anticipated difficulties

If you do not feel safe you may, in an effort to regain a sense of order and security, become rigid in your efforts to control and predict situations. You may also need to display a sense of creativity in a personal way to feel that your skills are being used. This may be expressed through organising or planning events.

Leadership qualities of the Purple value orientation
Psychological theme: belonging and grounding

Requirement for optimal performance

In order to express this value orientation optimally, you need to feel anchored within a group, team or family as your personal identity probably closely reflects your involvement in these groups. You are likely to feel proud about your in-group and enjoy empowering this group. A sense of belonging will make you feel confident enough to meet most of life's challenges.

You seem to currently generate energy via your sense of connection and community with people that are important in your life (family, friends, your team). In doing so, you provide a protective environment that offers you and other group members the security you need.

Expected leadership behaviour

You are prepared to sacrifice personal benefits for those you care about. You are dedicated to your group, organisation and even towards your country (likely to be patriotic in supporting sports teams, national identity, values and symbols). You are loyal and trustworthy with those close to you and expect family, friends and colleagues to act in the same way.

Anticipated difficulties

If your circumstances or environment do not allow you to exercise this valuing orientation, you may feel blocked in life or that your strengths are untapped. This can result from being on the outskirts of a group or not feeling a part of a group that you identify with. This may give you a sense of alienation, low energy, a feeling of helplessness and powerlessness. Eventually, it may lead to an avoidance of social contact, an external locus of control (a belief that external circumstances control your life) or a reliance on luck or superstition. This may have certain health implications.

Effective leadership

According to Graves, who conceptualised the Spiral Dynamics model, leaders should practice Politeness, Openness and Confidence (Autocracy) as these leadership characteristics accommodate and empower those with any of the value orientations in different ways.

Politeness

(being civil, sensitive, considerate, respectful, low ego-involvement, shows interest in others)

When someone is polite, the different value orientations are likely to perceive it in the following manner:

YELLOW
Welcome the positive climate and non-intrusiveness

ORANGE
Appreciate the tact, political skill and sophistication

RED
Sense respect and recognition

TURQUOISE
Feel free to explore, experience and to be

GREEN
Welcome the empathy and compassion

BLUE
Appreciate the decency and substance

PURPLE
Feel safe and included

Openness

(being transparent, honest and straightforward, sharing information, listening to and considering different perspectives)

When someone is open, the different value orientations are likely to perceive it in the following manner:

YELLOW
Have the freedom to initiate possible changes

ORANGE
Feel free to disagree and offer alternative solutions

RED
Feel free to take ownership / initiative without being judged

TURQUOISE
Appreciate the full range of insights

GREEN
Reassured that everyone is being legitimised

Be enabled to take a moral stand and motivate it

PURPLE
Feel safe to express fears

Confidence

(autocracy, taking charge, accepting responsibility, willingness to put oneself on the line)

When someone is confident, the different value orientations are likely to perceive it in the following manner:

YELLOW
Appreciate the competence, responsibility and direction

ORANGE
Agree with the individual initiative, image management, and self-empowerment

RED
Respect the assertiveness and power

TURQUOISE
Understand the power of intention

GREEN
Accept this if it seems to benefit everyone involved

Welcome the clear voice of authority

PURPLE
Appreciate the protection of a strong leader

SECTION 7

Developmental guidelines

This section is included in every report and is not specific to Elmien1's results. This section is meant to answer some of the frequently asked questions on how a person can develop their value orientations.

The value orientations are arranged as holons. A holon is a structure where each successive level includes and transcends the previous one(s). It can also be described as a soft hierarchy. The higher levels in the spiral include increasing levels of awareness. The key factor for effective functioning involves a match between a person's value orientation and the nature of contextual challenges. Given this contextualised nature of value orientations, higher order value orientations are thus not necessarily more beneficial. However, developing an understanding of all the value orientations is useful within interpersonal contexts.

Growth of awareness is dynamic in nature given the complex interactive variables involved. These may include the individual's personality, cultural and educational background, opportunities, significant life events and the impact of the physical and social environment.

The following are prerequisites for growth:

- any discomfort, pain or trauma that the person perceives to be associated by adhering to a particular value orientation needs to be understood and constructively resolved
- exposure to and understanding of all the various value orientations
- a conscious choice to act in accordance with a different and contextually appropriate value orientation
- an awareness of and symbolic interpretation of messages, coincidences and synchronicities in the external environment
- opportunities for quiet reflection and meditation
- a compassionate and understanding approach towards oneself, others and the environment needs to be adopted

Personal choices that impede growth lead to stagnation and a loss of energy and adaptability.

Summary of Elmien1's VO results

	Acceptance	Rejection	Conflict (both acceptance and rejection)
Purple	Values group belonging. Finds safety and security in the familiar. Tends to be attached to traditions or customs. May have an us-versus-them orientation	Questions the tendency to be too reliant on in-groups. Not concerned with the preservation of traditions / customs. Sceptical of the us-versus-them mentality	Values group belonging, but is not dependent on group support. Values traditions or customs but will not necessarily resist change. May reject an us-versus-them mentality in others
Red	Energetic, driven, but could be impulsive. Self-focused and wants to be recognised and respected	Rejects a forceful, impulsive and dominant approach. Does not see life as battle to secure an own share. Questions self-centred behaviour	Can be forceful and dominant, but mindful of the possible negative consequences of selfish behaviour. May try to control emotional reactions to situations. Dislikes being subjected to powerful others
Blue	Self-controlled, ordered and disciplined. Dutiful and diligent in tasks. Strives to do the right thing and values the ultimate truth	Rejects the overemphasis on conformity, order, discipline and authority. Guards against absolutist and judgemental inclinations	May adhere to an internalised code of conduct while rejecting externally imposed rules and regulations
Orange	Achievement / performance oriented. Self-reliant, values success and the good life. Works with perceptions. Motivated by challenge and opportunity. May take calculated risks	Rejects an overemphasis on personal achievement, status symbols, competition and material wealth. May find the quest for the good life superficial. Dislikes manipulation	Not indifferent to the lure of personal achievement and the good life, but careful not to see these values as ends in themselves. Recognises the importance of perceptions but avoids manipulative behaviour
Green	Humanistic and energised by interpersonal relationships. Likely to be sensitive, compassionate, philosophical, relativistic, open-minded and idealistic	Questions an over-emphasis on the human factor. Not energised by interpersonal relationships and not motivated by charitable endeavours.	Values interpersonal interaction but decisions are not determined by it. People oriented but mindful of overly idealistic views on humanity
Yellow	Individualistic and may have an intellectual perspective. May seem somewhat emotionally detached. Has the capacity to deal with unstructured situations. Likely to use systems thinking and focus on practical utility	Not particularly learning oriented. Not comfortable with disorder and unstructured situations. Unlikely to be very individualistic or take a detached, intellectual stance	May have an emotional need for structure. Can be emotionally detached at times, but also use a more emotionally involved approach
Turquoise	Self-transcendent, reflective, holistic thinker, spiritual and guided by a higher consciousness. Seeks deep connection. Planetary concerns. Focuses on the human experience	Rejects an essentially spiritual / other-worldly and abstract approach to life. Not inclined to adopt a philosophical-existential view on reality. Not interested in the meta-physical realm	May be collectively inclined, but questions a view on reality that is too abstract. May experience difficulties with self-transcendence
